land, until your Oratrix married her husband, Bernard R. Baumgardner, in January, 1921. That the said Georgia C. Davidge died in the spring of 1923, intestate, leaving as her only heir at law and next of kin your Oratrix. That there were no children as the result of the marriage between the said Georgia C. Davidge and Robert Harold Davidge. That from the time of their marriage the said Robert Harold Davidge looked upon and treated your Oratrix as if she were his daughter instead of his stepdaughter, and called her "daughter", and she in turn looked upon him as a father, treated, respected and designated him as such and called him "Dad". That your Oratrix was only eight years of age when her father, Jeremiah J. Kennedy, died. That this relationship between your Oratrix and the said Robert Harold Davidge continued until the death of the said Robert Harold Davidge, in spite of the fact that the said Robert Harold Davidge was an inveterate gambler, frequently attending races for the sole purpose of making wagers on horses and indulged in other forms of gambling, in which he lost considerable money. On account of this weakness, he was unable to accumulate and save money. That the said Robert Harold Davidge was a very dissipated and intemperate man from the time of his marriage to the mother of your Oratrix until the time of his death. That he frequently drank to excess, became intoxicated to such an extent that he was unable to care for himself and became dependent upon your Oratrix and her mother, during her lifetime, who were required to devote a large part of their time and make personal sacrifices in conducting the typewriter business, in nursing and caring for him. That after the death of his wife, he became much more intemperate so that frequently it was necessary to place him under the care of a physician. That when your Oratrix and her husband were married in January, 1921, they made their home with Thomas H. Baumgardner and his wife, the father and mother of the husband of your Oratrix on North Market Street, in Frederick City, Maryland.
